

New managing director promoted by specialist security provider

2 years ago

Amulet has announced the appointment of Kieran Mackie as its new managing director.

He has worked for the business for five years as its commercial director, responsible for developing and implementing commercial strategy according to the business's goals and objectives. He takes over from Darren Read, who has been appointed as chief operating officer of Churchill Group, Amulet's parent company.

Mr Mackie has worked closely with Mr Read and plans to further enhance the company as an employer of choice as part of its strategic goals. This will involve bringing a new generation of talent into the security industry, making a career in security an attractive proposition through training and personal development programs, and fostering a people-focused culture to deliver outstanding service.

He will also build on recent technological innovations, such as Project Blueprint, the real-time situational awareness software that is exclusive to the company in the private security sector. The combination of a people-first organisation with the latest technology will ensure clients receive the most effective security solutions, the company states.

Mr Mackie said: "I am delighted to be taking on the role of MD at Amulet. Darren has handed me the reigns at a truly exciting time for our industry, and I look forward to cementing Amulet as the security provider of choice by hiring passionate, personable people to look after our clients. A valued, supported and motivated workforce is critical to business success which is why I'll be focussing on hiring, retaining and developing the top talent available."
