

New employee tasked with driving sustainability and quality assurance

2 years ago

Access solution provider Codelocks has appointed Paul Campbell as its new technical, quality and sustainability manager.

With over 30 years' experience in architectural ironmongery, he brings a wealth of knowledge to the role and will focus on driving his employer's newly launched sustainability initiatives, while also working towards new accreditations.

The company has been in business for over 30 years and in that time sustainability has become more important for the company. Social, economic, and environmental sustainability are equal priorities for long-term viability. Recognising this, it has shown commitment to a sustainable future by adding sustainability as one of its six core corporate values, along with appointing Mr Campbell to drive its initiatives.

He said: "A priority in my role will be empowering the team around me. Through regular audits, monitoring our processes and targets, we can ensure that we collectively work towards Codelocks' new sustainability and quality goals. Behaviour change will come through finding efficiencies across the whole of Codelocks' global operations. We'll begin with the UK, but quickly expand to incorporate the wider organisation. I have knowledge to share and I'm excited to start helping the company progress to the next level."

Managing director Colin Campbell said: "After more than 30 years of operations, Codelocks is looking to mature in certain areas, and bringing Paul on board will enable us to make that level change. We're streamlining our entire supply chain and with the aim to make as many efficiencies as possible. Paul will make that a reality for us, and there will be positive benefits for everyone – customers, suppliers, and employees."
