

Social mobility recognition for Willmott Dixon

2 years ago

The work of Willmott Dixon employees to drive social mobility and increase the life chances of those less fortunate was recognised by Hertfordshire's Lord-Lieutenant Robert Voss, who presented group chief executive Rick Willmott with a King's Award for Enterprise for Promoting Opportunity.

The company was one of only nine companies recognised this year in this category.

It is the fourth such accolade for the company, and the first from HM King Charles III. It was awarded in recognition of the wide-ranging activities of its people to make society a better place, especially for those who face significant barriers to achieving their full potential in life.

In the last year, four out of five of the company's 2,000 plus workforce have delivered a social value-based activity in their community to improve the life chances of others. This includes mentoring, supporting people with interview training, careers advice and enhancing a local community asset for people to use. In all, last year saw its team create and deliver over 608 community programmes and engage with over 70,000 people in activities to boost their life chances. This led to 88% saying it had a beneficial impact on them.

In total, over 48,000 hours were volunteered by the company's people, and this led to over 200 people facing major barriers to work gaining employment through the company's intervention. The company also helped further drive social mobility among the most vulnerable and less fortunate by spending over £2.5m with social businesses last year.

Mr Willmott said:

“This sense of purpose to help the communities where we work is in the very DNA of our company. From offering opportunities and employability skills for those facing major barriers to employment, to improving buildings so they encourage better community cohesion – our social value projects are an important reason people want to work for us and their impact is something our customers and communities value hugely.

“I want to express my deep appreciation to everyone who’s work has made a difference. This award belongs to us all, and it reflects the passion and dedication we share for helping others.”
